Property Description:

Wright's Adventure, more commonly known as the Fox Hall farm, is located at 29701 Backtown Road on the east side of Trappe in Talbot County, Maryland. The two-story, three-bay, single-pile frame house, located at the end of a long farm lane, faces south with the gable roof oriented on an east/west axis. The house is joined on the site by a frame well house and a dilapidated frame storage shed.

Built around 1880, the two-story, three-bay, center hall plan frame dwelling is supported on a brick pier foundation and the exterior is clad with aluminum siding over plain weatherboards. The medium pitched gable roof is covered with asphalt shingles. Attached to the east gable end is a contemporaneous two-story frame service wing. The well house stands southeast of the house, while the storage shed is located to the northeast.

The Wright's Adventure farmhouse follows the common two-story, three-bay, single-pile center hall plan house form, a type of residence built in large numbers across the Eastern Shore of Maryland during the mid to late nineteenth century. Largely dating to the last decades of this period (1850-1900), these houses were executed in varying degrees of decorative detail. The Wright's Adventure house is a relatively plain example in comparison to others in Talbot county with the exterior decoration limited to a turned post porch. The interior is equally modest with decorative finishes limited to factory produced woodwork. The two-story service wing is also a common component of farmhouses of this period.

The Wright's Adventure farmhouse is ineligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places due to its plain, undistinguished architectural character. The ordinary nature of its architectural finishes links this farmhouse to hundreds of others of similar date in Talbot county leaving no basis to single out this house for recognition.

The Wright's Adventure farmhouse follows the two-story, three-bay, single-pile, center hall plan house form, a type of residence built in large numbers across the Eastern Shore of Maryland. Largely dating from the last decades of the nineteenth century, these houses were executed in varying degrees of decorative elaboration. The Wright's Adventure house is a relatively plain example in comparison to others. The exterior decorative detail is limited to a turned post porch. The interior is equally modest with decorative finishes limited to factory-produced Victorian mantels. The two-story service wing is a common form of addition for the period.

The tract name "Wright's Adventure" has been associated with 238 acres of this farm since the mid nineteenth century, and was named most likely during the ownership of Gibson W. Wright or perhaps his daughter, Mary Wright Newnam. Father and daughter held title to the land continuously between 1854 and 1883. Alexander B. Newnan (sic), Mary's husband, is designated at this site on the Trappe district map of the Lake, Griffing and Stevenson Atlas, published in 1877. Due to the late nineteenth century architectural features the two-story farmhouse could have been erected at the end of the Wright-Newnam ownership or perhaps just after during the period when Robert R. Butler held title, a tenure that stretched from 1883 to 1918. During the Butler ownership the house and farm were rented or leased for tenancy since the main Butler residence was the old Jenkins house on the White Marsh farm.

Prepare both a one paragraph summary and a comprehensive description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

Wright's Adventure, more commonly known as the Fox Hall farm, is located at 29701 Backtown Road on the east side of Trappe in Talbot County, Maryland. The two-story, three-bay, single-pile frame house, located at the end of a long farm lane, faces south with the gable roof oriented on an east/west axis. The house is joined on the site by a frame wellhouse and a dilapidated frame storage shed.

The two-story, three-bay, center hall plan frame dwelling is supported on a brick pier foundation, and the exterior is clad with aluminum siding over plain weatherboards. The medium pitched gable roof is covered with asphalt shingles. Attached to the east gable end is a contemporaneous two-story, two-bay frame service wing. The wellhouse stands southeast of the house, while the storage shed is located to the northeast.

The south (main) elevation of the main block is a symmetrical three-bay elevation with a center entrance and flanking two-over-two sash windows. The four-panel front door is topped by a two-light transom. Most of the first story is sheltered by a single-story hip roofed porch supported on turned porch posts. A concrete floor underpins the porch posts. The second story is defined by three evenly spaced two-over-two sash windows. The base of the roof is finished with a boxed cornice sheathed with aluminum.

The west gable end is a blind wall sheathed with aluminum siding over plain weatherboards. The edge of the roof has an extended eave with returns. An interior end brick stove chimney rises through the gable end.

The north (rear) wall is a three-bay façade with a center four-panel door flanked by two-over-two sash windows. The second story is defined by three two-over-two sash with the center window positioned slightly lower than the outer windows. The base of the roof is finished with a boxed cornice.

The east gable end of the main block is largely covered by the two-story service wing, which is slightly shorter in elevation with the roofline reaching the underside of the extended eave. An interior end brick stove chimney rises through the gable end of the main block. The north and south sides of the service wing are pierced by a combination of two-over-two sash and replacement single-pane sash. The edge of the roof is finished like the main block with boxed cornices and an extended eave with returns. Rising against the gable end is an exterior single-flue brick stack. Attached to the gable end is a single-story shed addition.

The interior is finished in a plain manner with decorative limited to Victorian mantels in the downstairs parlor and dining room. Plain pilasters support a plain frieze under a curved mantel shelf. The entire interior was not seen. The kitchen survives with a corner enclosed staircase fitted with a board-and-batten door.

The wellhouse is a small two-room frame structure with roof extension on its south side that shelters the well. The roof is supported by peeled cedar posts. The wellhouse is supported on a poured concrete foundation, and the exterior is sheathed with aluminum siding. The wellhouse is covered by a medium pitched gable roof of asphalt shingles. Standing northeast of the house is a single story shed roofed frame storage building with vertical plank walls. The building is in poor condition.

The Wright's Adventure farm dwelling follows the two-story, three-bay, single-pile, center hall plan house form, a type of residence built in large numbers across the Eastern Shore of Maryland. Largely dating from last decades of the nineteenth century, these houses were executed with varying degrees of decorative detail. The Wright's Adventure house is relatively plain in comparison to other examples with exterior detail limited to the turned post porch. The interior is equally modest with decorative finishes limited to factory-produced Victorian mantels. The two-story service wing is a common type of addition for the period. Due to the plain, undistinguished nature of the Wright's Adventure farmhouse, it does not qualify for nomination to the National Register of Historic Places.

HISTORY AND SUPPORT

The tract name "Wright's Adventure" has been associated with 238 acres of this farm since the mid to late nineteenth century, and was most likely named during the ownership of Gibson W. Wright or his daughter Mary Wright Newnam, who held title to this land continuously between 1854 and 1883.¹ Alexander B. Newnam (sic), Mary's husband, is designated on this site on the Trappe district map of the 1877 atlas.² A. B. Newnam is found also in the atlas patron list as a farmer owning 240 acres. Three years after the publication of the atlas the family was listed in the 1880 United States. Alexander, aged 44, was grouped with Mary E., aged 36, son John, aged 19 and 13-year old Carrie E. Newnam.³ Due to the late nineteenth-century features of the two-story, three-bay frame house, it could have been at the end of the Wright-Newnam ownership or perhaps just after during the period when Robert R. Butler held title, which stretched from 1883 to 1918.⁴ During the Butler tenure the house and farm was rented or leased for tenancy since the main Butler residence was the old Clark house on the White Marshes
